

Rhetoric in the Modern Era

Series editors, Arthur E. Walzer and Edward Schiappa

The goal of the series “Rhetoric in the Modern Era” is to prompt and sponsor book-length treatments of important rhetorical theorists and of philosophers and literary theorists who make substantial contributions to our understanding of language and rhetoric. In some cases, a book in the series is the first book-length treatment of an important figure; in others, a book in the series is the first to examine a philosopher or theorist from the perspective of rhetorical theory.

Books in the series are intended for nonspecialists—graduate students coming to the study of a theorist for the first time and professors broadly interested in the rhetorical tradition. The books are comprehensive introductions—comprehensive in the sense that they provide brief biographies, descriptions of the intellectual milieu, and discussions of the major scholarship on the figures as context for a detailed examination of each figure’s contribution to rhetorical theory or history.

Titles Available in the Series:

George Campbell: Rhetoric in the Age of Enlightenment, by Arthur E. Walzer
